

Even decades after the breakup of AT&T, the regional Bell companies continue to rest on the laurels of their local monopolies by offering poor customer service and making only the minimum effort at efficiency and modernization necessary to avoid a sea-change to use of mobile phones as primary home lines. Every front on which the regional Bell companies can be opened to competition is beneficial to consumers and ultimately to the regional Bell companies themselves.